Development and validation of a PCR method for the detection of enterotoxigenic Escherichia coli in poultry feces. Enterotoxigenic Escherichia coli (ETEC) is a common cause of acute diarrhea and represents a significant public health problem in many countries, including Mexico, with an annual estimated economic burden of up to US$2.5 billion. This work describes the development of a real-time PCR assay targeting the heat-stable enterotoxin I gene (hst-1) of ETEC that is able to detect the presence of this pathogen in poultry feces and shows good sensitivity and specificity. The results of the assay were compared with results obtained using culture methods for the detection of ETEC in poultry feces, and a positive correlation was observed ($r=0.93$).
